

People for Proper Policing in North Wales

"We need more Persuasion and less Kill Bill."

Deputy chief constable Clive Wolfendale Blamed Hollywood for a 450% rise in violent deaths in the region. He urged people to stop watching Quentin Tarantino and start reading Jane Austen.

Mr Wolfendale, below, was speaking out after new figures revealed that between April and November last year 2004, North Wales Police investigated 11 killings compared with just two in the same period in 2003.

Attempted murders rose 50% from six to nine, while wounding offences rose nearly 30% from 89 to 115. Yesterday's figures also revealed a rise in road deaths - despite the force's controversial anti-speeding campaign.

But overall North Wales saw one of the biggest falls in crime in England and Wales and the highest crime detection rates.

Mr Wolfendale said: "We have seen an unprecedented year in the number of violent attacks, which have led to deaths. All of these have been swiftly detected.

The PPP comments ... all this despite £75million spent on CCTV and to quote the same officer, North Wales being the safest place in Europe.

Another problem could be that most of the perpetrators can't read, won't read and Jane Austen may be a touch boring and OTT grammar wise. It's Not easy for our overeducated DCC to understand such issues despite his keen interest in 'diversity' issues. The image below to us is more frightening than kill Bill
